
New Study of obesity looks for larger test group

A recent study of Obesity revealed that in order to keep their research going, they must find larger test subjects. Dr. Gibson, the head of Obesity Research Society, says that: "Obesity was surely different when I grew up. Back then, obese people were HUGE. Today, there has been a sudden decrease in the obese population. Some blame Jersey Shore's "GTL" policy, others are saying the "Subway Diet" is responsible but either way it is unacceptable." Dr. Gibson has spent his whole life attempting to preserve the obese population and has very little funds backing him. He has now started an Obesity Preservation Charity to help raise awareness of the importance of the obese society. "They keep our Super Marts open and our corner stores profiting. Without them, society as we know is will go down the tubes." - Dr. Gibson. As of now, Gibson's charity has raised over $20.00 towards preserving the obese population. (The fact that Dr. Gibson himself deposited the $20.00 is irrelevant). Gibson plans to travel to schools and organizations to increase awareness of his charity but the funding is somewhat lacking. Despite this, the Prime Minister, Steven Harper, did say that Gibson's research was "crucial for our nation to coordinate and prosper." This is a big compliment towards Gibson and he often uses it as motivation to keep working at achieving his overall goal: to protect and preserve the obese population in Canada.

- Canadian Obesity Chart (2009-2011)

- Dark blue: 09
- Light blue: 10
- White: 11